

Charity Assets Trust

Positive absolute returns with low volatility for charities

During January, the fund price rose by 3%. This compared with a rise of 4.2% in the FTSE All-Share Index and an increase of 1.1% in the FTSE Government All-Stocks Index (both figures are total returns in sterling).

As they entered the new year, the question for many investors was whether the market woe towards the end of 2018 represented no more than a brief, routine correction or the beginning of something more ominous for financial assets. Some traditional recessionary signals, such as the US yield curve, were beginning to flash amber and mounting fears over a global economic slowdown certainly pointed to the latter. However, for much of January investors were granted a degree of respite. Renewed optimism was attributed to reduced friction between the US and China, the end of the longest US government shutdown in history and, most significantly, comments made by Jerome Powell, chair of the US Federal Reserve. He, and other members of the Federal Reserve, took many opportunities throughout the month to hint at their ability to suspend the tightening of US monetary policy, if necessary. Risk assets, such as equities, were buoyed by this market-friendly positioning from the Federal Reserve in the view that interest rates have now reached their peak and US quantitative tightening will soon be ending.

The equities in the fund were therefore the main contributors to the positive performance this month and the cyclical bias, in areas such as industrials and automotives, was particularly beneficial. These areas remain on attractive valuations and have the potential to perform well should the market continue to regain momentum. The fund's inflation-linked bonds also added to performance, fueled by falling interest rate expectations and global economic data which was stronger than expected. Equally, in a month when investors began to regain their risk appetite, the other protective assets in the fund detracted from performance. However, as the underlying issues that unsettled markets in 2018 are still very much present, these assets remain a vital part of the fund's allocation. Concerns about credit are increasingly entering the mainstream market commentary and Mark Carney of the Bank of England recently expressed concern with the rapid pace of growth in the leveraged loan market. We continue to believe that corporate credit represents the epicentre of risk for asset prices. This growth has coincided with a significant deterioration in loan terms, usually in place to protect investors, and many highly-g geared companies are now positioned on the precipice of default should credit markets deteriorate. If we begin to see investors lose faith in low grade credit, the protective assets should perform well and help to preserve capital within the fund. We believe the current market bounce lacks true conviction and any recovery may not be sustained as it has previously. In particular, quantitative tightening remains the central protagonist in our concerns over deteriorating liquidity conditions and asset prices. Markets have, for now, become comfortable that Jerome Powell is on their side and the antics of December are behind us, but the Federal Reserve's true concern will be the inflationary pressures continuing to feed through from the tight US labour market. With average hourly earnings accelerating at their fastest pace since 2009 in January, the tightening path ultimately looks set to continue.
