An alternative to alternative asset management

During May the net asset value (NAV) increased by 0.3% to 205.8p. This compared with a rise of 0.7% in the FTSE All-Share Total Return Index. The small discount to NAV closed over the month as the share price rose 1.6% to 206p.

The old investment adage, 'sell in May and go away', looked apt by the end of the first week of May as sentiment started off on a negative footing. However, by the end of the month equity markets had largely regained their poise to finish broadly unchanged. May therefore appeared to be a month of marking time before the more market sensitive events of June. This month we will see the 'Brexit' referendum, the next round of central bank meetings and a Japanese Upper House election.

From a UK investor's perspective the most pressing of these is probably the EU referendum vote. Whilst politicians from both the 'in' and 'out' camps plead their cases, it has become increasingly clear that neither they nor the electorate are in a position to know what things would look like should the vote be for a Brexit. Should the status quo prevail then sterling could be surprisingly strong, (as we have already seen in recent weeks), hence our desire to stay close to our base currency. While sterling weakness in the short term would be an opportunity missed, with a global portfolio our principal concern is the certainty of a capital loss should sterling strengthen.

On a global basis, the key issue is the continued debate about when (or indeed if) the US Federal Reserve will raise interest rates. From the middle of May financial markets appeared suddenly to be reminded that the Fed is not done with raising rates after December's lift-off following a seven year pause. Expectations for a rise in June have fluctuated with each new data release or Fed speech, and investors wavered between hopes of a normalisation and fears of what that might mean for asset prices. In contrast to previous occasions, financial markets have largely taken these machinations in their stride. The dollar has unsurprisingly seen some renewed strength, creating a headwind to emerging markets and most commodities. However stable oil prices and orderly credit markets helped keep equity markets steady.

The end of May saw the much anticipated G7 meeting in Japan. Whilst the outcome was unsurprisingly short on detail, the gathered leaders decreed that 'the world economy faces big risks' and a more flexible approach to driving global growth may be required. Whilst this does not represent unilateral support for a large fiscal stimulus, it appears to be a step in that direction. Post the meeting the Japanese prime minister announced the deferral of the increase in Japan's consumption tax, despite comments to the contrary from his finance minister at the G7. This move was not immediately accompanied by any further stimulus package but this may follow. The yen strengthened on this disappointing outcome. Despite being nervous about leaving our base currency, we had increased our yen exposure earlier in the month; a defensive move that has helped. We still think that we may see more dramatic policy shifts in Japan as the election campaign gets under way on 22 June shortly after the next Bank of Japan meeting. Both events could deliver positive surprises.
