

Investment monthly report

Released 12:56 14 September 2018

This announcement replaces the announcement titled "Monthly Investment Report - August 2018" on 12th September 2018 at 17:35. The monthly report mistakenly stated that the FTSE All Share Index fell 0.7% in August, when it should have read that the FTSE All-Share fell 2.8%. The remainder of the announcement remains the same.

An alternative to alternative asset management

During August, the net asset value of the Company fell by 1.2%. This compares with a fall of 2.8% in the FTSE All-Share index.

The US equity market moved past January's all-time high. This rise has been driven by a steadily narrowing group of stocks, which typically does not augur well for future returns. Elsewhere, it was a much soggier picture with UK, European and Japanese equity indices all falling during the month and the damage was even greater in emerging markets. Not many safe haven assets performed. The dollar and yen only appreciated by 1-2% against a weak pound and gold was largely unchanged in dollar terms. Gold miners were hit harder with the gold mining index down 13%: a combination of emerging market and commodity weakness.

Emerging market currencies grabbed most of the headlines. Turkey has long been identified as vulnerable, due to excessive debt (much of which was taken out in foreign currencies) and an authoritarian political regime. The Turkish lira has now fallen 74% this year. Argentina is also showing how fragile paper currencies can be. As the peso plunged, interest rates moved up to 60% in August – a far cry from the western world of ZIRP (zero interest rate policy). It remains to be seen whether there will be any contagion effects to other emerging economies, but it is a healthy reminder of how quickly these things can unravel and how widespread the effects of tighter monetary policy in the US can be felt. Much has been written about gold's lacklustre performance in recent times, but if you were holding bullion in Ankara or Buenos Aires this month you would be sitting on gains of 32% and 35% respectively, when the world around you has been tumbling down. It has done exactly what is required.

Cracks in the eurozone continue to appear as Target 2 balances (effectively the quantum of deposits moving from Club Med to Germany) surpassed the peak of 2012/2013. Relatively robust economic growth is masking a plethora of underlying problems. At some point this will have to crystallise in a banking and fiscal union or risk a break-up. For now this is tomorrow's story. In the UK the savings rate plumbed new all-time lows at the same time as a fall in house prices. Despite this, there was a token increase in UK interest rates to 0.75%, but this does not mask the fact the Bank of England is (deliberately) behind the curve and loose monetary policy persists.

Looking forward our position remains that while global economic growth looks respectable, asset prices only look justifiable on a relative basis assuming that long term interest rates remain settled. If bond yields start to rise (and there are plenty of reasons to believe that they may) then the sort of stress that we have seen this month in far flung places may have a greater impact closer to home.
