

LF Ruffer Absolute Return Fund

Positive absolute returns with low volatility

During January, the fund price rose by 3.1%. This compared with a rise of 4.2% in the FTSE All-Share Index and an increase of 1.1% in the FTSE Government All Stocks Index (all figures total returns in sterling).

After their pronounced fall in December, January saw global equities recoup some of their losses, rising around 5% in sterling during the month. The principal reason was not hard to find: soothing words from Jerome Powell, chairman of the US Federal Reserve, concerning the future path of US interest rates and the shrinkage of the Fed's balance sheet, both of which had been key factors in December's sell off. With markets sensing that the US central bank was back on their side, little further encouragement was needed for equities to rally sharply.

We are more than a little concerned that the above development has made investors complacent, and increased the Fed's dilemmas going forward. Markets have now priced out any rises in US interest rates this year, even though US jobs growth remains strong, unemployment is at 40 year lows and US wage growth above 3%. If such trends continue, interest rate rises will be back on the table, and the confidence of last month could evaporate rapidly. If, on the other hand, the Fed stands pat in such circumstances, the risk of inflation seeping back into the system will grow, and it will be deemed to be behind the curve and to have lost control of policy. Under those conditions the portfolio's US inflation-linked bonds, which we increased towards the end of last year, will step into the limelight.

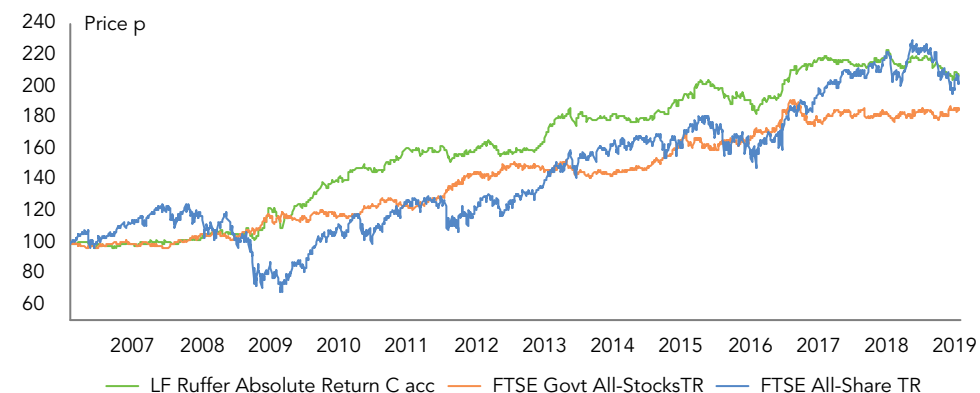

On a short-term view, we have no grouse with the view that equities could rally further, and to that extent it has been pleasing to see several of the portfolio's cyclical stocks, some of which we added to in the extreme weakness of Q4, staging a healthy recovery last month. However, we are loath to raise further the portfolio's exposure to equities. While January saw a strong recovery in credit, we remain concerned about the continuing degradation in lending standards and the lack of risk premium being offered to buyers of corporate bonds. Today, 50% of outstanding investment grade credit is rated BBB, (one notch above junk status), whilst the underlying corporates have higher leverage and the loan documents fewer protective covenants than at the peak of the last cycle. While our credit protections unsurprisingly lost ground in January, giving back some of the near 30% gain made as markets fell in Q4, we took the opportunity brought about by that weakness to reinforce those positions. This reflects our belief that the area of credit remains the most treacherous part of the financial system. With liquidity in this market a shadow of its former self, we believe any accident in corporate bonds could rapidly spread to other risk assets, further supporting our relatively cautious stance.
