Consistent positive returns by investing in a diversified portfolio of Asia Pacific securities

August 2018 Issue 178

During August, the fund fell by 1.8% compared to the 0.2% decline in the FTSE All World Asia Pacific ex Japan Index and a 2.4% decline in the FTSE Emerging Index, both adjusted for sterling. Emerging market fears intensified with a worsening US dollar squeeze faced by weak links such as Argentina and Turkey. In Asia, China weakness continued, with FTSE China falling 2.7%, as a US-China trade war overhang persisted with further deceleration in fixed asset investment.

China's technology stocks performed especially poorly, falling 5.1% in August and 13.8% year to date. Wanting to sift through the rubble for potential gems, and to better understand the long-term investment implications of China's wave of home-grown innovation, we travelled to Beijing to meet with a variety of technology companies and industry experts. Technology and the internet have played a major role in China's transition to a consumption and service-led economy, but how will these innovation-driven businesses stay relevant to ensure secular staying power?

For many e-commerce businesses serving China, the emergence of a plethora of consumer touch points are pushing them to rethink retail strategies across physical, social, artificial intelligence (AI), and 'internet of things' (IoT) commerce. As JD.com puts it, retail is increasingly an exercise in 'providing the right products to the right customers in the right settings and at the right time'. Serving what used to be a mass market – and the world's most populous one – is becoming serving the market of one. The winners in this transition will be those who cannot only manage a decentralised retail model, but also deploy the necessary supply chain and logistics changes to meet dynamic planning, pricing and inventory requirements.

Although AI is still a relatively new word to investors, a favourable regulatory environment in China has given its businesses a meaningful advantage in deploying, and now, monetising AI. For Baidu, AI-powered advertising innovations include dynamic recommendations, customised store pages and augmented reality enabled video advertisements. For China's FinTech industry, applications in loan and insurance underwriting, risk management and AI-as-a-service are all opportunities directing future investments.

Lastly, technology continues to transform old industries like manufacturing. 'Industry 4.0', widely referred to as the fourth industrial revolution, describes the automation and data exchange in manufacturing technologies. China's Ministry of Industry and Information Technology published detailed plans in 2017 for the formation of an industrial IoT ecosystem, as part of a national scheme to improve manufacturing through adoption of open source platforms that allow data sharing and analysis from different parts of a business. With industry forecasts of $800bn in value by 2020, there is significant growth runway for infrastructure and application software vendors. Our Chinasoft holding capitalises on this thesis, and we continue to look for names to increase exposure to this theme. For investors, technological innovation can either promise great profits, or the risk of losing it all to uncertain regulations and unproven business models. As such, we remain vigilant in trying to separate boom-and-bust speculation from sustainable winners.
