Ruffer Total Return International

Positive returns with low volatility

O and OI classes February 2023 Issue 140

February saw the return of a 'good news is bad news' dynamic in markets as a string of positive economic surprises out of the US reignited concerns about inflation and, with it, expectations of more central bank rate hikes. This meant January's Goldilocks 'soft landing' became February's 'no landing' – a scenario in which growth remains stronger for longer, forcing interest rates to remain higher for an extended period. This was painful for most assets, with bonds suffering the most severe whiplash as global bonds followed up their best (ever) January with their worst February performance since 1990.

Whilst the bond market adjusted in real time, with yields and short-term inflation expectations rising over the month as markets priced interest rates in the US to reach 5.5% by the end of the summer (up from 4.9% at the start of the month), equities remained remarkably sanguine. At least until Valentine's Day brought stronger than expected US inflation data, hitting January's equity darlings as rate-sensitive names fell furthest (the Nasdaq fell 6.9% on the month). Against this backdrop of rising yields, the fund's long-dated inflation-linked bonds suffered, as they were not met with a commensurate rise in longer term inflation expectations. Gold, which had the additional headwind of a rising US dollar, also detracted from performance. Our protective assets offered little help as volatility and credit spreads remained subdued. Whilst a falling oil price over the period was reflected in the negative contribution from our commodity exposure, the fund's energy equities made positive returns.

The question now is whether this is just a blip in this year's risk rally, or a sign of things to come. So far, a confluence of factors has created a tactical runway for markets in the coming months. These include China re-opening, a European energy-driven rebound, US consumer resilience and positive liquidity from central banks in China, Japan, and Europe. In light of this we have used the recent weakness to add to some of our risk assets, primarily via China sensitive equities and commodities. However, we do not view this set up as sustainable for 2023 as a whole, and our positioning continues to be informed by three essential judgements: inflation can't fall back to target without recession, recession won't come without tightening financial conditions, and we won't get tighter financial conditions unless central banks are hawkish.

We are already seeing evidence a global growth rebound is inconsistent with sustained disinflation. With Fed officials having now put a 50 basis point hike back on the table, we expect both fundamentals and liquidity conditions to be challenged in the second half of the year. Hence, we have used this year's decline in volatility (equity and credit) to dial up the protection in the portfolio, using VIX calls again for the first time since 2020. What's more, equity risk premiums remain extremely depressed (at the time of writing, the yield on a six month treasury bill exceeds the earnings yield on the S&P 500) and thus our overall allocation to risk assets remains low in favour of the optionality of cash.

The danger today is the equity market had a narrative that it is now reluctant to abandon. We, the Fed and the bond market, it seems, have Keynes in our minds: "When the facts change, I change my mind – what do you do, sir?" So far equity markets and many investors, do not.

Ruffer performance is shown after deduction of all fees and management charges, and on the basis of income being reinvested. Past performance is not a guide to future performance. The value of the shares and the income from them can go down as well as up and you may not get back the full amount originally invested. The value of overseas investments will be influenced by the rate of exchange. Future performance is subject to taxation which depends on each investor's personal situation, and may be subject to change in the future.

Investment objective

The investment objective of the Ruffer Total Return International ('the fund') is to achieve low volatility, positive returns from an actively managed portfolio. The fund may have exposure to the following asset classes: cash, debt, securities of any type (including government and corporate debt), equities and equity related securities and commodities (including precious metals). Overriding this objective is a fundamental philosophy of capital preservation. Investors should note that there can be no assurance that the investment objective will be achieved.
