

LF Ruffer Equity & General Fund

An actively-managed fund emphasising absolute growth with diversity of risk

During the quarter, the fund's O accumulation shares decreased by 0.14%. This compares with an increase of 2.2% in the FTSE All-Share Total Return Index. The emergence of quantitative easing (QE) has been a key development for markets since 2009. The consistently low inflation and the effectiveness of QE (as tested during the financial crisis) meant that whenever markets have been weak and fears of potential deflation have appeared, the US Federal Reserve (and most other central banks) has pushed the QE button. Repetition brings familiarity -- as the 'mere exposure effect' in psychology describes our tendency to develop preferences for things we become familiar with. The period of covid-19 was no exception: the Fed acted forcefully and promptly, in essence pushing the familiar alarm button of QE.

Looking back to 2009, we know how the Fed will act: if markets and the economy are in danger and the usual fear of deflationary forces emerge, QE will be enacted. The bigger the crisis, the bigger the force of QE. What could break this virtuous roadmap or the 'Fed put' for markets? The obvious answer is the potential emergence of inflation. High inflation would mean that the Fed might find it harder to activate the familiar button of QE. What could significantly increase the probability of inflation? Continued increases in the oil price. The oil related business models involve annual depletion and the emergence of ESG has led to very little motive for the leadership of most oil majors/exploration and production (E&Ps) to explore and develop future production. Thus, as most economies aim to normalise and gradually open up, the probability of higher oil prices has increased. Therefore, in addition to our shareholding in ExxonMobil, during the quarter we increased our direct oil exposure by buying Chevron and adding to our position in BP.

We have followed Chevron for many years. It has acted in a balanced manner, is less contrarian than ExxonMobil and is perceived to be less controversial in its environmental strategy. Chevron's capital allocation has been solid and it is offering a dividend yield of more than 5% with relatively low risk under most macro conditions. BP is probably on the other side of ExxonMobil. The former is European, thus following a relatively aggressive strategy of investing in alternative fuel initiatives but it opted for cutting its dividend during the pandemic. ExxonMobil has been the most vocal proponent of investing counter-cyclically in a falling oil market. Unfortunately under its former CEO, Rex Tillerson, capital allocation was weak (eg investments in Russia and Iraq were ill-timed) and the operational focus of ExxonMobil has been questioned during the last few years. To the current management's credit, ExxonMobil fulfilled its long term consistency to shareholders and maintained its dividend during covid-19, even though its balance sheet was stretched due to its heavy capex plans. Exxon has recently attracted activist investors, thus it is a business under pressure and facing potential change. Mobil While Exxon offers a dividend yield of c 6%, it is probably a higher risk, higher reward investment case (versus its history). At REG we intensely focus on risk adjusted returns -- currently at c 5% of REG, our oil related investments are part of our hedges against a more inflationary world.

Ruffer performance is shown after deduction of all fees and management charges, and on the basis of income being reinvested. Past performance is not a guide to future performance. The value of the shares and the income from them can go down as well as up and you may not get back the full amount originally invested. The value of overseas investments will be influenced by the rate of exchange.
